Does Brexit Mean That Globalisation Is Dying? Should It?

Silsby Evans and Graeme Wood

The Huffington Post

When some people do not benefit from the growth (due to globalisation), they are dissatisfied and feel disenfranchised in the current setup.

Identifying the Disenfranchised

This is to be expected and is also a cause for concern. When someone does not benefit from growth, they are often alienated and feel disenfranchised. This can lead to unrest and even conflict. The question then becomes: How do we ensure that everyone benefits from growth? We need to focus on improving the lives of the disenfranchised. This is crucial for achieving a fair and inclusive society.

The era of globalisation also reveals another truth: Wealth inequality within countries has increased, inequality across countries has decreased.

In an era of rapid change, the polarisation of income is a major concern. This polarisation is a result of globalization, which has enabled some countries to grow faster than others. This has led to increased inequality within countries, which can have negative consequences. Inequality can lead to social unrest, political instability, and reduced economic growth. It is important to address this issue and work towards a more equitable distribution of wealth.

We will have to find a way to ensure that growth from globalisation is more evenly spread through better healthcare and education systems, and the creation of more opportunities.

It is crucial to address the issue of wealth inequality and work towards a more equitable distribution of wealth. This will require a concerted effort from governments, businesses, and individuals to ensure that everyone has the opportunity to benefit from globalisation.